

The Cultural
English Centre

Write

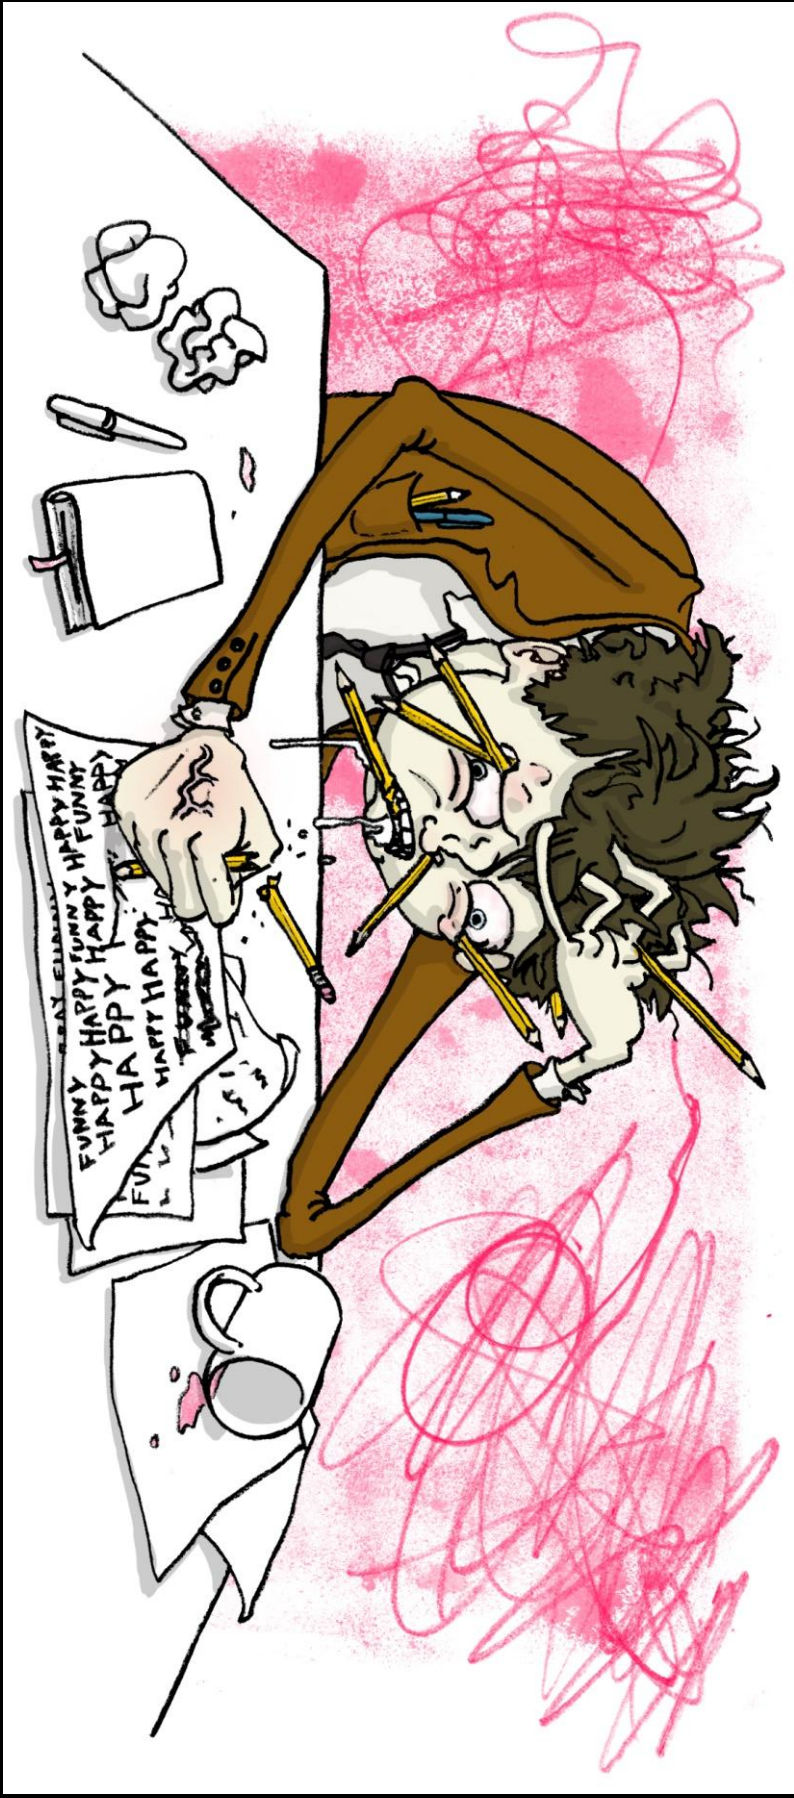

Angel Anderson

The Cultural
English Centre

Write
Boldly

Angel Anderson

Problems with writing

- Lack of skill in L1
- Lack of language
- Lack of confidence
- Lack of motivation
- Lack of imagination

Writing for B2-C1

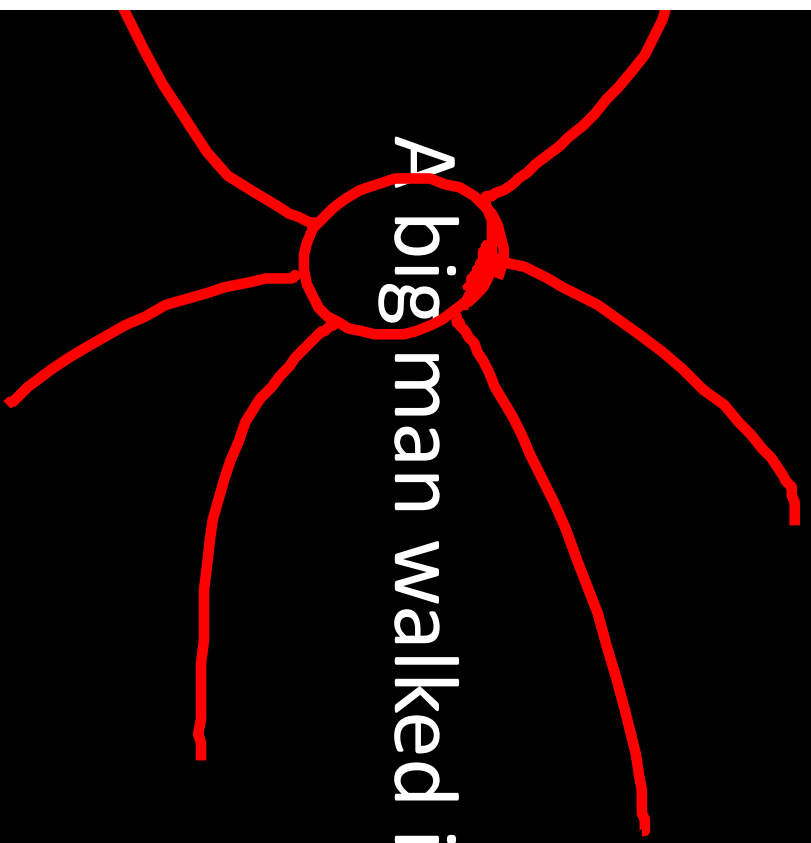

- Sense of level
- Sense of competency
- Autonomy

- englishprofile.org

A big man walked into the room.

A big man walked into the room.

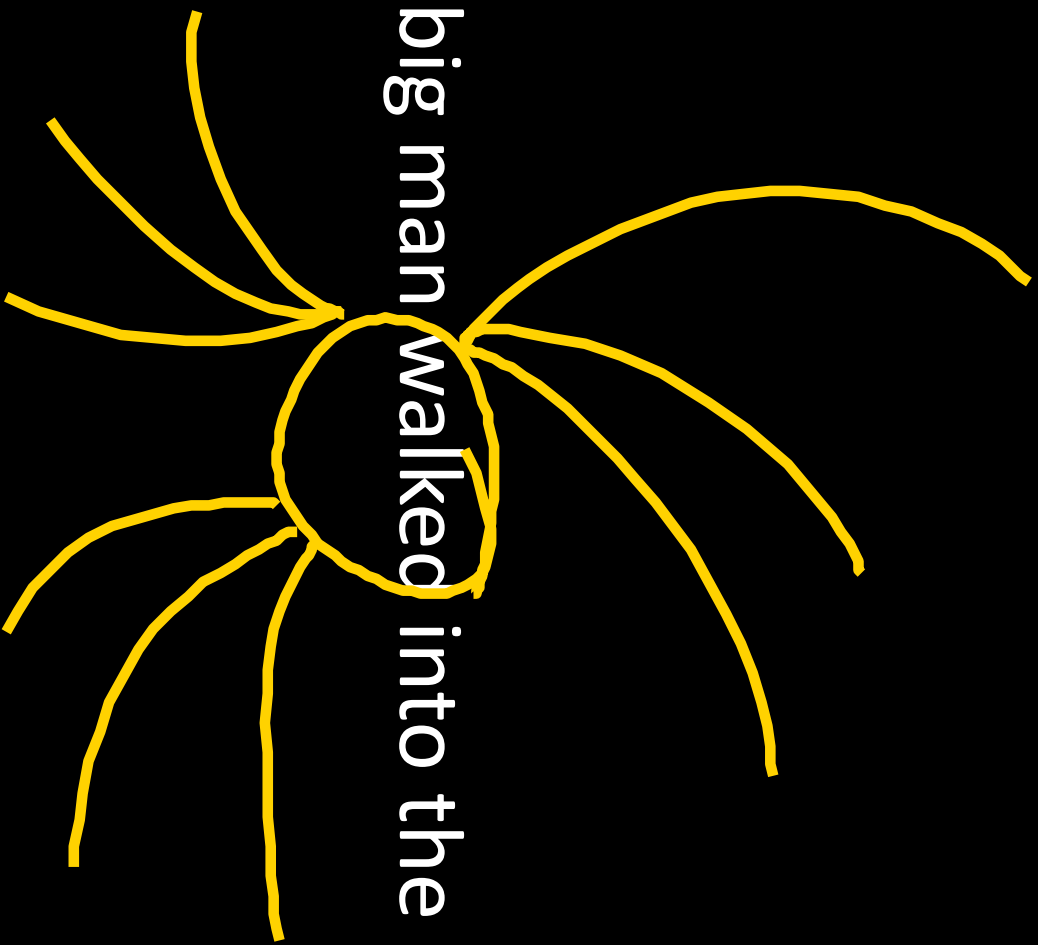

A big man walked into the room.

A ~~thin~~ man walked into the room.

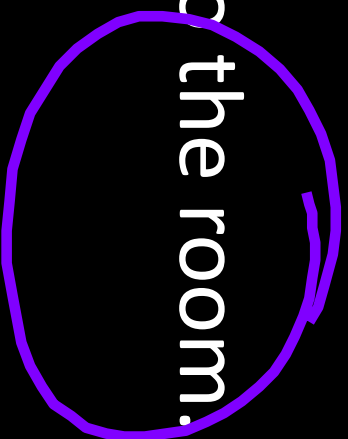

A big man walked into the room.

A big man walked into the room.

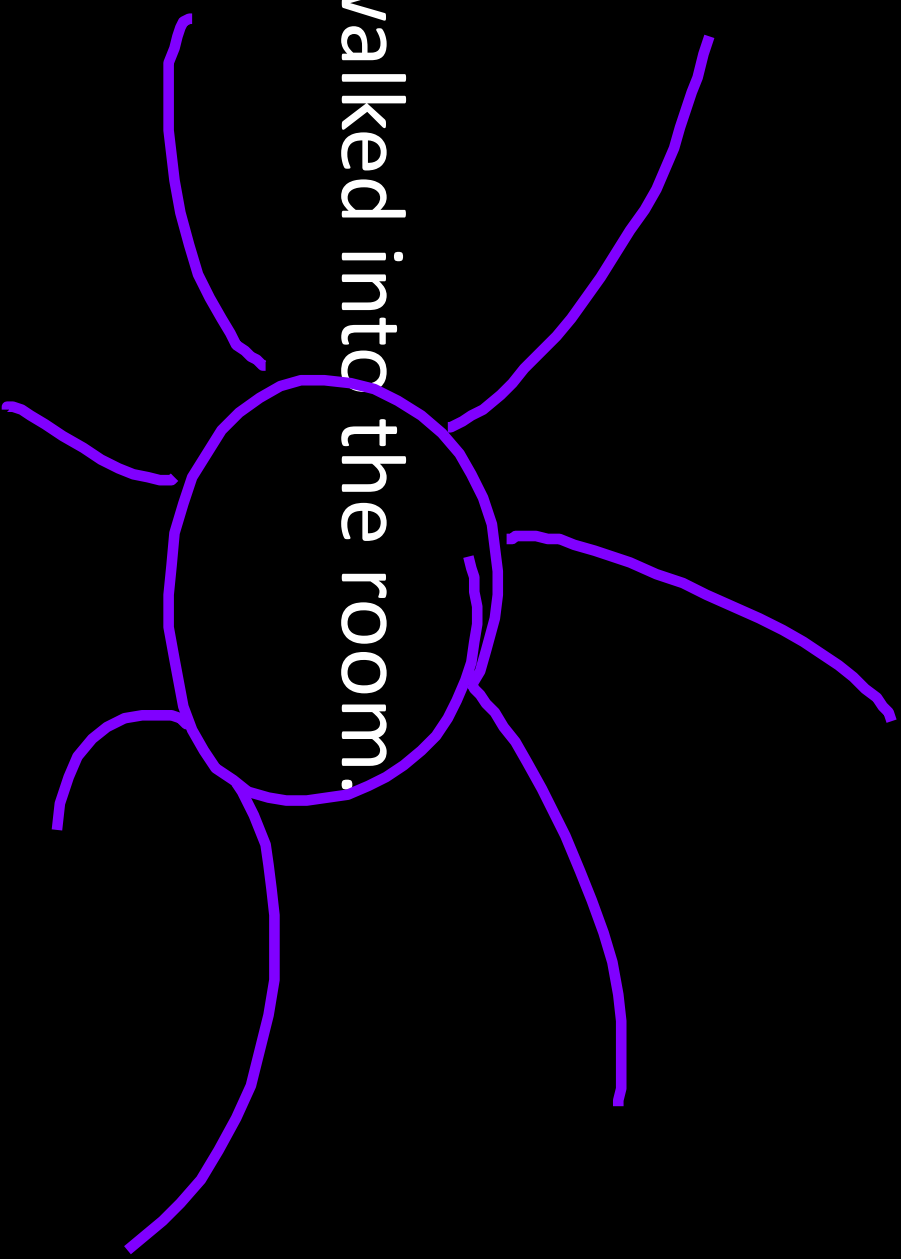

A big man walked into the room.

A big man walked into the room.

A big man walked into the room.

A big man walked into the room.

- “I’m hot, I’m really hot. I’ve never been so hot in all my life. Hell, I’m sweating like a pig!” said the tortoise to himself as he was walking through the dry desert. He had been walking for days on end, but he didn’t know where he was going. If he had known, he might not have been complaining so much.
- “If I had been born an eagle, I’d be able to fly, fly away to somewhere that isn’t so damned hot.”
- ‘Eagle’, this must have been the worst word to pass through his brain. He could have chosen any other bird, but no - ‘eagle’ was the bird that came to mind. This might have been his subconscious letting him know danger was on the wing, because unbeknown to him was the fact that he was being followed by that very bird.
- “I’ve been walking for days... I’ve ... WTF!”
- Suddenly he was walking no more. He had been grabbed in the sharp talons of the eagle and was being taken higher and higher, the ground getting further and further away. And now he was falling, spiralling towards earth, faster and faster. He must have been the fastest moving tortoise in history.
- “If only I had wings...”
- But he didn’t reach the ground. Someone stood between him and that hard desert surface. Thump! And this is how Aeschylus, Greek tragedian, is said to have been killed. History, unfortunately, doesn’t record if the tortoise survived.

Like I said,
it's a test of confidence.

- The woman walked into the city centre. She looked at some clothes in the windows of the shops. She didn't want to buy anything. She didn't have much money.
- She entered a supermarket and stole food.
- The shop security saw her. They phoned the police. The police came. The woman said to the police "go away!" The police shot her.

SHOPLIFTERS WILL BE BEATEN, STABBED AND STOMPED

SURVIVORS WILL BE PROSECUTED